

This is just the beginning, Mr. President. Yesterday, at the Upside Conference, a meeting of high-tech industry leaders here in Washington, Roberta Katz, General Counsel for Netscape, said of the government's case against Microsoft, "This is about a lot more than just Microsoft." To Ms. Katz I say, be careful what you wish for, be very careful what you wish for. Today the government's target is Microsoft, but tomorrow, it could very well be Netscape.

The Antitrust Division, in filing its case against Microsoft, is working to justify an expanded role for government in the high-tech industry. The further its tentacles are allowed to reach into high-tech market, the tighter its grip on the industry will become.

In fact, at a hearing tomorrow before Judge Jackson, the Justice Department will request that it be allowed to expand the scope of its case against Microsoft. There are two explanations for the Justice Department's motives; both are troubling. The first is that the Antitrust division is seeking to increase the aspects of the high-tech industry over which it will gain control if it wins the case. The second is that the Division is becoming increasingly desperate to find an issue, any issue, on which it can prevail in court.

The first point should be of no little concern to Ms. Katz of Netscape and her counterparts at all the other high-tech companies cheering the Justice Department on. But it is the second point on which I would like to expand.

The Antitrust Division knows that its case against Microsoft is literally falling apart at the seams. As my colleagues will recall, on June 23 a three judge United States Appeals Court panel overturned the preliminary injunction issued against Microsoft last December. The heart of the injunction, and the heart of the Department's current case against Microsoft, is the company's decision to integrate its web browser into its Windows operating system.

As soon as the Appeals Court ruled that the integration of browser technology into Windows as not a violation of U.S. antitrust law, Joel Klein started scrambling frantically for other claims to make against Microsoft. If the Administration's concern was truly that Microsoft was acting illegally in integrating products into Windows, the Justice Department would have and should have dismissed its case then and there. But it didn't.

Joel Klein continued attempts to drag more and more issues into the case is telling, Mr. President. Those attempts are a clear sign that the government's real beef with Microsoft is its size. The government can't stand the fact that Microsoft is successful. Microsoft, in the eyes of the Administration, is just too big. So the Justice Department will do everything it can to paint Bill Gates as the bad guy.

As Holman W. Jenkins, Jr. aptly described it in an editorial in Wednesday's Wall Street Journal, Joel Klein "has spraypainted the world with subpoenas, calling companies to testify about every failed and not-yet-failed collaboration between competitive allies and allied competitors in the computer industry."

the strategy, according to Rick Rule, is "the old plaintiff's trick of throwing up lots of snippets of dialogue that try to tar the defendant as a bad guy."

Aside from all the legal commentary, the real issue, Mr. President, is that the Justice Department's case against Microsoft is a bad one. Joel Klein knows it, the high-tech community knows it, and I know it.

No legal wrangling can disguise the fact that what the Administration is doing is wrong. It is not only wrong in the sense that the Justice Department will probably lose in the end. But it is wrong in the sense that the very premise on which it stands is at fundamental odds with the free market capitalism that has made this nation great.

U.S.-ASIA INSTITUTE

• Mr. INOUE. Mr. President, the U.S.-Asia Institute, a non-profit organization, recently completed its 40th Congressional Staff Delegation to China and Hong Kong in cooperation with the Chinese People's Institute of Foreign Affairs (CPIFA). I am pleased to bring this milestone to the attention of the Senate.

The Institute's commitment to promoting friendship and understanding between countries in Asia and the U.S. government goes back almost 20 years. Founded in 1979 by Esther Kee, Norman Lau Kee, and Joji Konoshima, the U.S.-Asia Institute has been steadily working to achieve its goal through international conferences, seminars, student exchange programs, and Congressional staff trips to Asia.

Among its numerous activities in support of cultural understanding, the U.S.-Asia Institute's Congressional staff trip program to China and Hong Kong is unrivaled. Since its inception in 1985, the China program has hosted more than 320 Congressional staff members in numerous places throughout China—from Heihe in the North on the Russian border to Hainan in the South; from the dynamic coastal cities of Shanghai and Guangzhou to the remote city of Urumqi, an oasis on the ancient Silk Road; and to the capital, Beijing. Over 150 Congressional offices have benefited from the intense, hectic, fact finding programs that provide Congressional staff members a unique opportunity to observe this dynamic nation first-hand and to further their understanding of complex Sino-U.S. relations. This program has survived the sometimes tumultuous relationship between the two countries thanks to the steadfast commitment of the U.S.-Asia Institute and the CPIFA to promote dialog on issues of mutual interest to our two great nations.

I congratulate the U.S.-Asia Institute and CPIFA for their remarkable achievements and hope their long-standing partnership will continue into the 21st century.●

TRIBUTE TO LIEUTENANT GENERAL RICHARD A. BURPEE, U.S. AIR FORCE, RETIRED

• Mr. INHOFE. Mr. President, I rise today to pay tribute to an exceptional leader in recognition of a remarkable career of service to his country—Lieutenant General Richard A. Burpee, United States Air Force, retired. Dick Burpee has amassed a truly distinguished record, including 35 years of service in the Air Force uniform, that merits special recognition on the occasion of his retirement as chairman of the board of directors of the Retired Officers Association.

Born and raised in Delton, Michigan, he is now a distinguished citizen of the great State of Oklahoma. He enlisted in the Air Force just after the Korean War in 1953. Subsequently selected for pilot training, he earned his aviator's wings and Second Lieutenant's commission in 1955.

Over the next decade, Dick served in a variety of flying and staff positions, including assignments as an instructor pilot and as an exchange pilot with the Royal Canadian Armed Forces. In the process, he successfully completed studies leading to the award of a bachelor's degree in economics and a master's degree in public administration.

During a 1967-68 tour of duty with the 12th Tactical Fighter Wing in Vietnam, he distinguished himself with a record of 336 combat missions in the F-4 fighter and the award of the Silver Star, two Distinguished Flying Crosses, a Bronze Star and fifteen air medals.

Air Force leaders recognized the talent and potential of this general-to-be and selected him for prestigious positions at Air Force headquarters in Washington, DC, first in the Office of the Director for Operational Test and Evaluation and subsequently as an aide to the Air Force Vice Chief of Staff.

Following completion of the National War College and selection for promotion to the grade of Colonel, he returned to operational flying duty in a series of leadership positions, ultimately serving as Commander of the Strategic Air Command's (SAC) 509th Bombardment Wing in 1974-1975.

Exceeding even the Strategic Air Command's high standards of leadership excellence, Dick Burpee was hardly getting started. Following selection to General officer rank, he carved a path of performance and achievement through assignments at Headquarters Strategic Air Command, as Commander of the 19th air division, and in senior plans and operations positions at Air Force headquarters in the Pentagon. From 1983 to 1985, the great State of Oklahoma had the good fortune to get to know Dick Burpee as a particularly outstanding Commander
